

Map . . .

husband, testified Monday that he used such a map to plan a scuba diving trip to Baja California before the crimes were committed and that he later returned it to Tullis. Shown the map found at the murder scene, Adams testified it may be the same one he used.

One or two hand-drawn markings on the map look familiar to him, he said.

Adams' wife was more emphatic. She said there's no question in her mind that the map found at the murder scene is the same one used to plan the scuba diving trip.

She was present when Adams and one of his friends used the map in her Hayward apartment in August 1976, she said.

She clearly remembers the map, she explained, because some of the markings on it had caused her to wonder in 1976 whether Adams and his friend also were planning another trip that they weren't telling her about.

Defense attorney Timothy Guhin pointed to some discrepancies in her testimony that might indicate she's mistaken. She insisted, however, that she's absolutely certain it's the same map.

Still to come is the remaining two-thirds of the prosecution's case. It involves alleged sightings of the children with Summers and his friends as recently as 1980, and incriminating statements Summers supposedly has made to fellow prisoners and to police.

The trial, which is expected to last at least three more months, is scheduled to resume this morning before Superior Court Judge William Pitt Hyde.
