

Wise . . .

the jury. "The whole house was just completely closed up. Everything was shut."

That was unusual, he said, because, "To say the least, our house was the community house for all the kids" in the neighborhood. Yet, no one was in the yard and the house was quiet.

After finding the body, Wise ran across the street and summoned a neighbor. Police were called and the investigation began.

The first day, Wise told the police that his wife's credit cards were missing. They have never turned up.

But it wasn't until days later, he testified, that investigators asked him if any of Brandi's medication had disappeared with her. When he checked he discovered that six bottles, containing about 1,000 pills, were gone, Wise testified.

(Wise said the pills were worth more than $200, but the expense was covered by insurance benefits.)

Also missing was some of the children's clothing, Brandi's suitcase, a couple of photo albums and a medical reference book, he said.

No other valuables — such as a

TV, stereo system or cash — were missing, he added.

Under cross-examination by defense attorney Timothy Guhin, Wise said that Brandi was known by her middle name, Jondell. If called by a name other than Jondell, Wise said, "I would say she probably would" ignore whoever had called her.

That information is expected to be important when other persons are called to the witness stand to discuss alleged sightings of the children with Summers and his friends between 1977 and 1980.

The trial is scheduled to resume this morning before Superior Court Judge William Pitt Hyde.
